After the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals ruled against reinstating President Trump's travel ban, White House senior policy adviser Stephen Miller on Feb. 12 defended the policy while Democratic senators continued to oppose it.

Miller said that officials are considering appealing with the 9th Circuit and having an emergency hearing "en banc," or before a larger panel of judges on the court; seeking an emergency stay at the Supreme Court; taking the case to trial at the district level; or writing a new executive order for Trump to sign that would withstand legal scrutiny.
